Unholy War:

Central African Republic

photographs by: William Daniels

The Central African Republic has been plunged into the bloodiest crossroads of its short history. In March 2013, rebels from mainly Muslim group called Seleka, overthrew the state, unleashing nine months of anarchy.

Militias called anti-balaka, whose ranks consist of Christians and animists, then launched unprecedented attacks against Muslims for their perceived support of the Seleka. Thousands were killed, triggering a wave of displacement. International forces have been struggling to stop the violence.

Biography: William Daniels

A child stumbles, smiling. He's been sniffing glue. He is one of the street children of Manila. Through the window of a car, a Libyan teenager stares into the distance. Gaddafi's army is approaching. The teenager is fighting for the first time. In Central African Republic, a woman appears to be faltering. What pain afflicts her? Traveling the world and its crises, either on assignment for major international magazines (Time, National Geographic, Le Monde) or for his personal work, French photographer William Daniels seeks out imbalance, tension, implosion. An image, for him, informs and suggests. It goes beyond the immediacy of the actual conflict and resonates long after.

His work has won numerous international awards including two World Press Awards, the Visa d'Or Humanitarian Award at Perpignan photo festival, the Tim Hetherington Grant and the Getty Grant.
